Thinking about popular education currently positions us as facing an enormous challenge that involves repositioning ourselves in the face of the changing social, economic, political and educational situation that we are facing.

To talk about popular education is to recognize the diversity of experiences and practical-theoretical journeys that our people, social organizations, educators have carried out.

That is why we speak in plural, because the experiential baggage is immense like our stories, geographies, subjectivities and challenges.

However, there are shared practices such as: starting from the reality of the subjects in order to transform it; opt for the subaltern classes and the commitment to a society free of inequalities and injustices; allow methodological and strategic diversity; promote instances of problematization and collective construction of knowledge; prefigure in daily actions that more just world for which we strive.
